

Research Companion is Open

All schools, colleges and universities can temporarily access Research Companion to help students develop information literacy and critical-thinking skills.

ProQuest has made library databases and other educational resources available to help schools transition to distance learning. While having remote access to content, schools should be sure to properly use that content.

That's why ProQuest is temporarily opening up access to key content for high school, college and undergraduate university students development to do scholarly research. Schools who don't currently subscribe to Research Companion will receive assessment tools from the product at no cost through June 30 at the end of the month.

Users will get access to 10 easy-to-navigate multimedia learning modules including Where do I find information? and How do I evaluate sources? These modules and other tools designed to walk users through the scholarly research process.

"Today's novice researchers are overwhelmed with too much information, data, and it's even harder when they're working remotely and don't have someone to turn to for immediate help," says Susan Wilkner, Product Manager Lead at ProQuest.

"Research Companion guides students through common challenges and helps them overcome their frustrations. It also helps educators measure their students' learning and identify gaps in their understanding."

"We're doing everything we can to help schools during these difficult times," added Wilkner. "We hope that giving all institutions temporary access to Research Companion will help students build the skills they'll need in the future."
